Tips Families Can Use to Help Students Do Better in School

Title I-Educational Service Unit 10

May 2023

Support your middle schooler's developing autonomy

Autonomy is the ability to think for oneself, make decisions and act independently. Middle schoolers crave this step toward adulthood, and responsible autonomy leads to greater academic achievement, higher self-esteem and less depression.

Developing responsible autonomy happens over time. To support the process:

- Discuss the school year with your middle schooler. What does your child think went well? What would your child like to do differently next year? Encourage asking teachers to suggest strategies for improvement.
- Involve your student in making plans for the summer. How does your child want to spend time? How will those ideas fit with family plans?
- Suggest volunteering for a cause your child cares about. Help your child research opportunities that match those interests.
- Establish reasonable guidelines for your child's social life. Within in them, allow your child the freedom to develop and navigate relationships without your direction. Wait to be asked before giving advice.
- Talk with your child about current events. Ask for your student's opinions, and consider them before sharing your own. Say that you are always interested in your child's ideas, whether or not you agree with them.

Schedule time for exercise

When students feel stressed, it is harder for them to do their best. Regular daily exercise has been shown to help kids feel happier, stay calm, sharpen memory and develop self-confidence. Help your child fit one hour of exercise into each day. Feeling in control physically may help your middle schooler feel able to take control of studies, too.

Choose words carefully

Assume that your child is listening when you speak, even if it doesn't look that way. Middle schoolers perk up their ears when they hear their names, and they are mature enough to note the tone of your voice. If you could be overheard, avoid making negative comments about your child to others.

Read some 'brain movies'

Can your child remember every detail of every Marvel movie, but nothing about reading assignments for school? Demonstrate how to turn reading into "brain movies":

1. Choose a poem or story that is filled with descriptive language, such as Edgar Allan Poe's "The Raven."
2. Find images online that set the scene and show them to your child (Poe's house is a museum in Baltimore).
3. Read the passage aloud. Ask your child to imagine and describe what it would look like as a movie.

Encourage your child to take the same approach with assigned reading.

Provide a lesson in stock market math

Having a lot of money to buy what they want is a common goal for middle schoolers. Here's a game to turn your child's interest in money into a deeper understanding of investing and how the stock market works.

1. Explain that stocks are pieces, or shares, of a company. Their value can go up or down, depending on how many people want to buy or sell them.
2. Show your child where stock prices are listed online.
3. Explain that after buying 100 shares of a $10 stock, your child would have $1,000 dollars worth of it. But if the stock goes up to $11, your child would have $1,100 worth. If it goes down to $9, the investment's value drops to $900.
4. Name a pretend amount of money, and let your child decide which stocks to "buy" with it.
5. Have your child track the stocks' values for a month. Each day, your child can chart the prices and figure out how much money the investment has made—or lost.
